It seems like every week, a big drug company is getting busted for pushing bogus studies and false claims about their products. Now it's Pfizer's turn. According to a lawsuit filed last Friday, Pfizer sent a letter to Medicare, saying that the US agency's recent publication of a health information pamphlet — which was intended to inform doctors and patients about new drug labels — would harm Pfizer's prescription drug promotion and sales efforts. The lawsuit also alleges that in the past two years, Pfizer has paid doctors to promote its drugs and submitted fake or fraudulent peer-reviewed journal articles about those drugs. It also says that Pfizer "paid over $300 million in secret bonuses to U.S. sales representatives so that they would over-promote Pfizer's drugs to consumers." In May, for example, Pfizer spent about $200 million buying more than 1,000 Web pages that portrayed itself in a positive light. Many of those pages were linked to real-world promotion in the form of paid newspaper advertising. In a statement to ProPublica, Pfizer said that the purchase of the Web pages was "part of our continuous review of our marketing programs to ensure we are positioning our medicines in the right way for the right patient at the right time." Pharmaceutical companies spend heavily on research and promotion, and need to keep persuading doctors that their drugs are effective. This can be a challenge when the research out there is not definitive or meta-studies that evaluate the results of all the studies in their area. Moreover, most doctors treat patients, not research studies, and they tend to consider new drugs in light of what other doctors have done, not just the evidence. This can mean that a company might encounter all sorts of hurdles, from a lack of perfect evidence on an emerging drug to the popularity of an alternative approach. Pfizer says that it has its own lab (the Pharmacological Research Section) where it uses clinical trial data to
