What's new in Flat Heroes:

: The Bloody Realm FilmoMia Report to modistd of the Danish Film Institute The Bloody Realm: A film by Anders Morgenthaler For the bi-lingual audience, the basis for this elaboration is the translation from the Danish original. Originally written for a new edition of: 'Krig og kunst,' Nationalmuseets Folkemuseum Assistance in the English language is provided by Anne Steffensen. Translator: Lene Wisson with the assistance of: Ragnild Thøje First published: Circ. 2006 The Centre for World Cinema at Aarhus University distinguishes itself in its concentration on the Danish contribution to the international art and culture of sound and film. Danish filmmakers operate in many different traditions, as well as in other areas, such as fiction, that applies to all of Danish film. By concentrating on the part of Danish cinema pertaining to sound and film art, the Centre supports the film up to and including international recognition. This report deals specifically with one part of the contribution, a less well known practice of sound and film art, the documentary. The issue of documentary editing has always existed but has never had the impact it has had in the latter half of the XX century. However, the issue of documentary editing in cinema is relatively acute at the moment. The speed-fire delivery of films, online streaming, digital video, TV, the ease of which we are able to produce our own material on our own devices, and the speed with which users of these technologies are able to consume such material, all result in a situation where the documents (of both film and video) that punctuate our modern, technological existence are becoming of greater importance. The issue has a global impact, even in the case of the major documentary filmmaker, and forerunner of more efficient social documentary in the western world, Ingmar Bergman, who wanted to offset the speed of this electronic process so that we could actually look at and see things as they really were: 'he photographed the world in all its gesticulation,' the work of the giant of the documentary by these so-called faster methods has ironically increased in visibility while the hitherto of afoot more contemplative and slow-moving camera has become an increasingly scarce resource in the hands of people who still want slow-motion film. Many people often think of documentaries as a speciality in which the question is given priority:
