Although the survival rates for these disorders are good, they are not optimal. A major contributor to morbidity and mortality for individuals with these disorders is the development of iron-overload and its associated complications. Specifically, iron-overload is a major cause of death among thalassemics, their younger siblings, and other individuals with inherited hemoglobinopathies (e.g., sickle cell disease). For this reason, and also because therapy for iron-overload in these disorders is inadequate, there is much interest in reducing iron-overload in the general population.
