This is a game where you must make a choice that will decide your destiny. You can choose to give in to machines and build the destruction of the world or choose the humanity. If you decide to support the machines, then you will be helped through the progress of the story and you will obtain an armory where you can equip weapons to fight against other players. If you choose the humanity, you will enter in a forest with fallen trees, where you need to escape from the machines and survive. You will lose health as long as you are fighting with an enemy. Make sure to recover with items. If you die you will restart with no health and the number of lives is 4. You will also lose all of your items and weapons. In the end you will be transported to the command center. There you will take control of the machines and send them to every city of the world that is under the control of the machines. The game will end if you are the last human alive. What's new in Cultist Simulator: The Priest:

Chapter 2: The Annual Booth Fight The annual Booth fight was big. Big enough to block traffic on both the road and the boat canal, big enough to burn a hole in the sun, and big enough to make me want to cry. Not because I'd lost a pet feline or something, but because I didn't understand how the hell it happened. Well, I'm getting to that. "What's that smell?" Taylor McCall and Orlando Boone, aka Boone and Bo, smelled like sweat and rotten cabbage, each of them wearing tight T-shirts that were too big on them by at least half-a-size. "What smell?" Taylor said before sucking in a breath, crinkling her nose and flashing me a disgusted look. I sniffed my armpit. I smelled nothing. "It smells like fever," Orlando said, "in the house and on the main road." "In the house," Taylor mimicked, playing the crazy and giggling. "Tight-ass shirt," Orlando said, his face still twisted with amusement as he nudged Taylor with his elbow. She giggled like a teenager and winked at him. They stared at me for nearly a second before realizing their mistake. "That shirt off, Boone," Taylor said. "An' replace 'em. Ta da da da...Tomahawk, Tomahawkta!" Bo yawned, scratching his back where the old injury remained. "Bo," Orlando said, "release the suit, man." "Later," Boone grumbled before grasping me by the shirtfront and dragging me down to a glass one-paned door set on a metal frame into the cavernous laboratory. While the two men held hands, I pulled the shirt up between them. "Whoa, son!" Boone said, laughing. "This shirt gets tight as a fisted." He dropped his hand to mine and pointed to the symbols etched into my side. They glowed in the golden light of the bubble. Boone smelled like spoiled cabbage, so he pronounced the first word three times: "Boulai!" He punctuated each syllable, his voice rising in pitch with each fricative. The combination of his imperfect English and bad breath made me laugh. "What the hell are they?" Taylor asked. "I don't know
